COHEN'S BAD LUCK.

COPYRIGHT 1907.

Length, 425 Feet. Price, $46.75.

Mr. Cohen is waiting for customers. With the assistance of Mrs. Cohen he "pulls one in". It is funny indeed to see how Cohen tries to make the suit fit. At last the customer is satisfied, but, instead of paying for the suit, he dashes out of the store, followed by Mr. and Mrs. Cohen.

The thief runs through streets and alleys, followed by half a dozen policemen and a mob of several hundred people. When collared at last, he jumps into the river. He is pulled out, but, behold the new suit! It is shrunk so badly that even Cohen cannot sell it any more.

No money, no suit, bad luck indeed!

Length, 860 ft. Price, $94.60

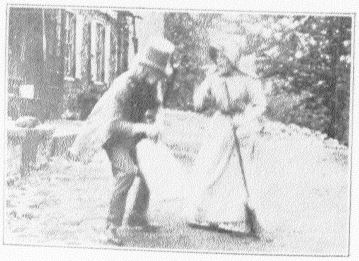
The rube sold a horse. Two confidence men having watched the bargain decided to relieve the rube of his money. They invite him to see the city, to which the rube consents.

A new rube in town. Zeke and his two new friends start out to see the city. They take him through the parks. He is a good old sport. He rides in the scenic railway, shoots the shoots and bumps the bumps. Tired and hungry he decides to go to a restaurant.

The two confidence men take Zeke in a private room where they fill him with whiskey. They invite a lady friend and pretty soon a card game is in full swing.

The rube fell asleep. The two confidence men and their lady friend take whatever money the rube has in his pockets and leave the place. When the waiter comes for his money the rube discovers the theft. He calls for a detective. The latter finds a visiting card upon the table which gives him a clue, and he immediately starts after the thieves.

The two confidence men and their lady friend retire into a summer garden, where they divide the spoils. It is here they are surprised by the detectives. After a hard struggle they are overpowered and taken into custody. The rube, glad to get his money back, starts for home.



Zeke's wife gives him a warm reception. After he has delivered the money to his better half and promised never to go to town again he is taken by the ear and led into the house.

But he had a good time just the same!
